Planning for the work ahead: Will you give us your input?

Hello, friends and colleagues! I hope you’ve been enjoying the better weather, healthier socialization, and new sights on life that come with the arrival of spring. We are thrilled to be with you and share this season of hope and renewal. As we move from one of the last years of the COVID-19 pandemic pandemic to one of our friends, colleagues, and loved ones.

A practical roadmap to guide learning health systems

In a learning health system (LHS), evidence from internal data and experience is combined with external evidence and routinely put into practice to improve care and patient health. But how does a health care organization create a successful LHS and measure its impact? A recent paper in the MacColl Center’s Learning Health Systems journal answers these common questions.

Delta Center awards $1.6M to support value-based care

The Delta Center for a Thriving Safety Net is the latest name for a sister program of the MacColl Center’s Learning Health System Program, which our changing world. One of our primary goals is to better serve you – our partners and collaborators across the country – in your efforts to transform care. In that spirit, we would love to hear more about your needs, interests, and the resources that you currently find most helpful.

New tools for advancing health equity in research, policy, and practice

The National Partnership for Women and Families recently released a set of excellent tools for advancing health equity in research, policy, and practice. These tools offer a roadmap for understanding the core components of a learning health system (LHS), how they relate to one another when operationalized in practice, and how to measure their impact. A recent paper in the MacColl Center’s Learning Health Systems journal answers these important questions, providing a roadmap for understanding the core components of an LHS, how they relate to one another when operationalized in practice, and how to measure their impact.

Stay in touch

Will you give us your input?

We at the MacColl Center would like to acknowledge that we are on the ancestral lands of the Puget Sound Coast Salish People. We at the MacColl Center would like to acknowledge that we are on the ancestral lands of the Puget Sound Coast Salish People. We at the MacColl Center would like to acknowledge that we are on the ancestral lands of the Puget Sound Coast Salish People.